The Night Train

Lena had never ridden a train at night. She pressed her face to the cool window as the train pulled out of the station. Lights from the town slid past like stars. The train rocked gently, clickety-clack, clickety-clack. Lena's grandma sat beside her, knitting a blue scarf. Are we there yet, Lena asked. Not yet, Grandma laughed. Watch for the big bridge. Soon the train rumbled over a long bridge. Below, the river shone silver in the moonlight. Lena counted three boats. Then her eyes grew heavy. She dreamed of rivers and bridges and stars. When she woke, the sun was up and Grandma was smiling. We are here, she said.
